A quarter of Singaporean employees felt pressured to compromise ethical standards, reveals Institute of Business Ethics' survey

Yet less than two thirds who were aware of misconduct reported it.

DATE 23rd September 2019 The Institute of Business Ethics today publishes the results of a survey which asked employees in Singapore their views of ethics in their workplace.

This is the first time that the IBE's Ethics at Work survey was conducted in Singapore. It asked employees how they experienced ethics in their day-to-day working lives and their perception of how ethical conduct is supported in the workplace. It asked whether they witnessed misconduct; whether they reported it; and what, if anything, stopped them from doing so.

The IBE has surveyed British employees since 2005, but given that organisations are increasingly taking an integrated approach at the international level, we have expanded the number of countries included in the research to cover France, Germany, Ireland, Italy, Portugal, Spain, Switzerland and the UK within Europe, as well as Australia, Canada, Singapore and New Zealand.

This survey report presents the findings of public research undertaken by ComRes on behalf of the IBE and the Stewardship Institute and describes the findings in Singapore and provides comparison with Switzerland and the UK.

Nearly a quarter (24%) of employees in Singapore had felt pressured to compromise their organisation's ethical standards and over a third (35%) were aware of misconduct during their past year at work. Awareness of misconduct was higher among Singaporean employees than Swiss (16%) or UK respondents (12%). Inappropriate or unethical treatment of people (50%) and misreporting hours worked (37%) were the most common types of misconduct reported.

Yet less than two thirds (60%) of survey respondents who were aware of misconduct said they raised their concerns with management or another appropriate mechanism.

Of those employees in Singapore who were aware of misconduct at work and decided not to speak up, the main reason was because they did not believe corrective action would be taken (41%). Yet, employees in Singapore who were aware of misconduct and spoke up were more likely to be satisfied with the result (71%) than employees in any other country surveyed.

Philippa Foster Back CBE, Director of the Institute of Business Ethics said: "The results of the Ethics at Work survey in Singapore show the impact managers have on employee behaviour, with a third saying they felt pressured by their bosses to compromise ethical standards. However, it also shows the positive impact of effective Speak Up procedures on employees. If organisations demonstrate their commitment to addressing concerns, employees will be more inclined to speak up about misconduct."

About the Ethics at Work survey

The IBE has surveyed British employees since 2005, but given that organisations are increasingly taking an integrated approach at the international level, we have expanded the number of countries included in the research to cover France, Germany, Ireland, Italy, Portugal, Spain, Switzerland and the UK within Europe, as well as Australia, Canada, Singapore and New Zealand.

This survey report presents the findings of public research undertaken by ComRes on behalf of the IBE and the Stewardship Institute.

This report describes the Singaporean findings and provides comparison with Switzerland and the UK. The survey was completed by a representative sample of around 750 working adults in each country aged 18+, including 759 working adults in Singapore. The survey was undertaken between 5th and 25th February 2018.
