

Are Britons' professional priorities changing? Randstad research shows 29% of people have quit a job because it didn't fit in with their personal life

Thursday 9 June, 2022

- 34% of people would rather be unemployed than unhappy in a job
- Randstad launches video series telling inspiring stories of individuals that have made a life changing career move.
- Randstad is offering individuals access to development sessions through its outplacement and career transition service, Randstad RiseSmart

According to new research from UK recruitment specialist Randstad, Britons are now prioritising wellbeing over work. The Randstad workmonitor report surveyed 35,000 employees across 34 markets and found that 34% of people would rather be unemployed than unhappy in a job, 48% would quit a job if it was preventing them from enjoying their life and 63% of people believe that their personal life is more important than their work life

In light of these findings, the research also showed that 29% of people also stated they have quit a job that didn't fit in with their personal life. To help those looking to transition to a new role Randstad is offering Britons the chance to find a job through its new career coaching initiative, Randstad RiseSmart.

The Randstad RiseSmart programme is made up of two-three real career coaching sessions per person, delivered by professional coaches. Those participating will gain full access to Randstad RiseSmart's career development platform. These sessions offer participants the chance to discuss anything from how to change role, change career or make improvements to their skillset in current roles.

To shine a light on those who've made a career change that has transformed their life for the better, Randstad has launched a video series entitled 'Bring it on'. The series spotlights four individuals, in roles ranging from ensuring the UK's cyber security to delivering training programmes for prisoners, centred around rugby.

Shaun: "Being bullied at work left me suicidal"

- Construction worker Shaun was stuck in an unfulfilling role, in which he suffered workplace bullying, which left him suicidal. He would often come home crying
- This comes as construction industry suicide rates are on the rise, with those in the sector three times more likely to take their own lives than in other sectors
- - Shaun has since made a positive career change which has helped turn his life around. He's now working in a job in which he's been able to make a meaningful contribution, including reclassing the Grenfell Tower following the 2017 disaster

Indiana: “If I can be in the same room as you, then I am also equal to you”

- As a young, Black woman, Indiana has always gained strength from her unwavering belief that “If I can be in the same room as you, then I am also equal to you”
- Working in the male-dominated Finance industry in her early 20s, as an Office Manager at an FX firm she often found herself the only woman of colour in the room
- She decided to make a change when Covid hit, giving her the opportunity to reassess her life choices
- She always wanted to work in the technology sector but found it hard to make the move; just 19% of the tech workforce are women and only 22% of students can name a famous female working in technology
- Indiana invested time during the pandemic in strengthening her skills to make herself more suited to the tech industry
- Indiana landed her dream job and is now Business Development manager for a publicly funded Business to Government (B2G) company working with procurement and disbursements
