Lead By Example

Great customer service begins with great leadership. If those at the top are enthusiastic and attentive to customers it sets a standard for all.

Have Core Values in Place

This ensures there is consistency within the customer experience and that all representatives understand what is expected of them.

Treat people well

If a business treats their employees well, these employees will treat customers with the same courtesy. Happiness is infectious, and ensuring team members feel valued will motivate them to go above and beyond expectation.

Focus on the Long term

Short term incentives, such as bonuses might inspire a burst of positive results, but brands risk performance falling once the incentive is over. 'Looking to the long term and offering incentives and programmes that reflect this outlook will maintain momentum, this is why we reward our contractors opportunities to further their progression and build a brighter future within the industry' states Atlas Outsourcing.

Build Trust

Using a customer's name, taking a genuine interest and offering solutions that work for them and aren't just a thinly veiled attempt to make a sale are key to building trust. Brands need to put themselves in the customer's shoes and appreciate every customer is different.

Listen

The best salespeople spend 80 percent of their time listening, not talking.

Little Things Matter

Small details and kind gestures are often what customers remember the most.

Help them find a Solution

If a brand can't help a customer, pointing them to a business which can will earn them great respect. Whilst they may not have made a sale, their assistance will stick in a customer's mind and bring them back in the future.

Appreciate

Brands should always be aware of how special it is that a customer has chosen their business over their competitors. Openly acknowledging this appreciation will help customers to feel valued.

Treat Customers Better

If a new product arrives that would be of interest to certain customers – tell them. Keep loyal customer informed of new developments and invite them to try new services ahead of general release. Make them feel special.
