Tuesday 12 September, 2017

Nottingham based outsourced sales and marketing firm Goldstream Incorporated believe a good evening routine is critical for success within the business. With thoughts focusing on success within Q4, the company is hosting weekly workshops on how their contractors can improve themselves professionally, hoping that this will increase their performance in the field.

About Goldstream Incorporated: <http://www.goldstreamincorporated.co.uk/about-us/>

A key point Goldstream wanted their contractors to take away from their workshop was the idea that an evening routine does not have to be complicated and extreme. In fact, they suggested their contractors kept their routines simple but structured to maximise their effectiveness. The firm concentrated on three key points: changing bad habits, eating healthy food and getting to bed early.

Goldstream have outlined that the key to creating a good evening routine starts with changing bad habits. They used examples of successful individuals and their routines to provide their workforce with inspiration. For instance, Carl Gustav Jung a leading psychologist highlighted the importance of eating a healthy dinner as a productive way of spending the evening. Goldstream used this example, suggesting their contractors try and cut out bad foods and focus on treating their body correctly to establish a positive mind-set for the next day.

Another bad habit highlighted by Goldstream Incorporated was the tendency for young professionals to go to sleep too late. They highlighted an eclectic range of successful individuals ranging from Elon Musk to Beethoven who shared this evening routine, often clocking off at 10 pm. The theory that early bed time and success correlate is supported by numerous studies, which Goldstream Incorporated utilised to drive home the point that their contractors should get those eight hours to hit the ground running the next day. They were adamant that the high-energy nature of the sales and marketing industry meant that clear headspace and positivity were essential for success, two things that could be aided by a simple but effective evening routine.

Goldstream Incorporated hope that their contractors take on board the advice provided in this workshop in hopes that this will increase their performance. At the core of Goldstream is the idea that preparation is key to success, and they firmly believe that this should begin the night before with a structured, simple but effective evening routine.
