Guardian Public Leaders Network supports government communicators

Wednesday 12 September, 2012

A new online space where public sector communications professionals can share information and best practice is to be launched by the Guardian Public Leaders Network, with the announcement of a new online hub, titled Government Communications, launching Wednesday 19 September.

Following the success of the Guardian Public Leaders Network, which provides insight and analysis of policy and leadership issues for managers of all public services, the new Government Communications hub will feature content commissioned, edited and owned by the Guardian. The hub will reflect the new structures, policies and priorities for all those involved in government communications, providing content, contacts and connections.

Jane Dudman, editor of the Guardian Public Leaders Network said:

“This is an exciting new launch, which will enhance the reach and range of the Public Leaders Network’s existing coverage. We know that government communications professionals face big challenges in implementing the government’s new vision for communications and this will be an online space in which those at the coalface can share their experiences, to give them an edge in a rapidly-changing world.”

The Guardian Public Leaders Network has more than 5,500 network members. To become a member and to get more details about the new launch - visit Guardian Public Leaders Network
