Harlette Secures Unicorn Status Amid Ongoing Trademark Disputes
British Beauty Brand Pursues London Stock Exchange Listing as Global Infringements Mount

LONDON – The British beauty and fashion company Harlette has announced it has achieved unicorn status, marking a major milestone for the luxury brand amid an escalating number of trademark infringements spanning multiple countries and industries.

Founded by Harlette DeFalaise, Harlette Capital Ltd confirmed the company's valuation has crossed the billion-pound threshold, with accounts receivable from trademark breaches by international firms, retailers, and capital companies exceeding £15 billion. The company claims more than 20 trademark infringements have been recorded without permission, with further legal action under consideration.

In response to this surge in unauthorised use, Harlette has applied for £4 billion in funding from the Saudi Arabia Public Investment Fund (PIF) and is actively seeking investment banks to support capital raising efforts tied to the infringements. The company is also preparing for a potential listing on the London Stock Exchange.

According to Harlette, numerous brands have used its registered trademarks without permission. These include American, British, French, Indonesian, and Australian firms across industries such as beauty, eyewear, clothing, and media. Notable cases involve luxury fashion houses marketing products under the Harlette name — including cashmere sweaters, lingerie, swimwear, and shoes — on platforms such as Amazon, eBay, and Depop. The trademark has also allegedly been used in entertainment content by streaming services.

The brand's legal coverage includes classes 3, 9, 20, 25, and 41 in the UK, US, and Australia, among others, spanning cosmetics, clothing, eyewear, furniture, and entertainment.

In parallel to its legal challenges, Harlette launched a new vegan red unicorn lipstick, which the company says symbolises both its market position and resilience. This launch coincides with what the company describes as the world's first "Agile Beauty Launch" — a fast-tracked development of ten new beauty products reportedly completed in just over two weeks, despite setbacks from Cyclone Alfred, which impacted filming in affected areas.

Harlette reports the new beauty range is valued at over £1 billion in its early stages, with internal research valued at more than £1 trillion. The brand says it has attracted high-end collaborations, including a perfume development deal in France and attention from Hollywood producers and global luxury advisors.

The firm is also pursuing patents in diverse sectors, from wearable technology to space and telecommunications. In total, Harlette holds six patents and numerous trademarks internationally. Harlette holds one patent, and five patents are in progress for connected bra & global spaceport space telecommunications in UK and Australia.

Harlette hold numerous trademarks internationally Harlette, Harlette Pearl, Harlette Galvanize, Harlette Galvanise, Galvanize, LoveHarlette, Love Harlette, Harlete, Heartlette.

The company also maintains publishing and film ventures in pre-production, including biopics and branded content series. Yacht Stories, Saudi Lingerie Campaign, 39 Anna Nicole Smith and IT Girl Lingerie.

As Harlette continues to defend its intellectual property, DeFalaise's brand is positioning itself for expansion while addressing mounting legal challenges. The company maintains that unauthorised use of its name undermines its decade-long investment in research, development, and branding. Harlette says it remains committed to ethical production, sustainability, and the defence of its creative and commercial rights across global markets.
