

Imperyo Encourages People to Travel

Monday 28 March, 2016

Sales and marketing firm Imperyo are urging professionals to embrace their inner adventurer and make the most of travel opportunities.

Some people look at business travel as an amazing opportunity, others feel it is a distraction from their daily responsibilities and are less than welcoming to the idea of uprooting their operations. Sales and marketing firm Imperyo believe that when done right business travel can deliver a wealth of benefits and help a professional to better not only themselves, but also those around them. Recently the firm's managing Director Claristelle Labrador returned from a trip to the Canary Islands and believes the experience has helped her to become more open minded and allowed her to develop her approach to new challenges and unknown situations.

Feeling inspired by her trip, Claristelle Labrador has shared some of the biggest benefits she believes can be achieved through regular business travel and adventure.

1. Business trips don't always have to be work, work, work, and scheduling some downtime, even for just a couple of hours can add huge value to both the experience and a professionals overall outlook. Business success requires a thirst for knowledge, and travelling to new countries and starting adventures can be a great way of igniting a passion for learning.

2. Travelling is a great remedy to boredom. Whilst humans are creatures of habit, performing the same tasks day after day can cause a drop in productivity, engagement and quality. Travelling keeps things fresh and exciting, and can help a professional realise the greater meaning behind what they do every day.

3. Being able to adapt to new situations is a skill all professionals must master if they are to survive the tricky world of business. Travelling is a great training ground for this as it involves a number of uncontrollables; a bag might go missing, a flight might be cancelled or a hotel may lose a reservation. Each of these instances can help a professional to roll with the punches and cope with the unforeseen.

4. Travelling exposes professionals to new cultures, people and stories which will ultimately make them better at their jobs, allowing them to see things from a great deal of perspectives and use their experiences to think more creatively.

Sales and marketing firm Imperyo love learning new things and since day one have made building a collaborative and supportive culture a major business priority. To support their contractor's desires to learn the firm offer mentorship in the form of one on one discussions, shadowing, interactive seminars and both national and international travel opportunities since returning from the Canary Islands Claristelle Labrador of Imperyo has set herself some new personal travel goals for 2016 to try new food visit a new city and gain more passport stamps. She is hopeful that the firm's contractors will follow her lead and be inspired to take up the challenge of broadening their horizons and embarking on more adventures in order to become better business professionals.
