About Legends Incorporated: <http://www.legendsincorporated.com/services/>

1. Start simple – New skills require time and attention; a good way of breaking it down is laying the foundations of knowledge. Then determining how best this will be incorporated into the systems being used, and following that develop an action plan for success.
2. Chunk time – Time is a resource for many is limited. A Harvard psychologist George A. Miller developed chunking, a theory that centred around tasks being split into small manageable chunks. Research has shown this method to be mostly successful.
3. Talk it through with someone – Practice reading out loud information that needs learning, this multi-level brain processing was found to be more effective than silent learning. A study at Montreal University has supporting evidence to back up this theory.
4. Write things down – with technological advances it is all too easy to rely on the internet for information. Upskilling requires knowledge to be learnt. A study by Betsy Sparrow of Columbia University confirmed that delegates who consciously wrote down heart facts free hand were more likely to retain information.
5. Take useful breaks – breaks are helpful when used properly, timed, and scheduled breaks are less likely to be detrimental to productivity.
