- Latest celebrity auction sees Madonna memorabilia at auction in Beverly Hills
- Musical instruments and memorabilia often used as collateral for luxury asset loans, says Borro
- Fender guitars, 18th Century Swiss violin, Ivor Novello award and a Beatles contract have all been used by clients

In the week that sees the largest ever collection of Madonna memorabilia go under the hammer, Borro reflects on Brits using music memorabilia and musical instruments as collateral for loans.

While the Material Girl auction will see more than 140 pieces of Madonna's clothes, jewellery, awards and handwritten notes sold to the highest bidder, Borro, the luxury asset lender, has seen a trend in both the UK and US of individuals and business owners using rare and valuable musical instruments and memorabilia as collateral for loans. In total, Borro has lent over £200,000 against music memorabilia in the last 12 months and £600,000 since launch in 2008 – seeing a 31% increase in volume, year on year, of this type of loan.

One such asset was an Ivor Novello bronze statuette, for contributions to British song writing and composition. Unable to disclose who the award belonged to; Borro can reveal the sculpture achieved a loan value of £4,000 for the client. In terms of instruments Borro has completed 75 individual loans on guitars, lending a total value of nearly £400,000 against them. One Gibson Les Paul Guitar achieved a loan value of £50,000.

Other interesting assets used by clients include a Beatles record contract, an 18th Century Swiss violin, a leather jacket belonging to an (unnamed) rap star, original photographs of The Clash and The Who, and original artwork for an album cover.

Paul Aitken, CEO and founder of Borro, commented: "The "Material Girl" is a music icon and no doubt the auction that starts this week in Beverly Hills will see fans and collectors outbidding each other for a piece of music history. We have seen clients in both the UK and UK realise investments they have made in rare and prized musical instruments and memorabilia can be used down the line to release capital. Unlocking the value of unique personal assets provides a solution that doesn't involve permanently parting with valuable assets – that may also have a great deal of sentimentality attached."
