Mandatory Training Updates More Important Following National Bereavement Survey

Monday 5 August, 2013

After a national bereavement survey criticises the level of medical care from staff, mandatory training courses from agencies like Global Health Professionals proves to be more important than ever.

A recent survey commissioned by the Department of Health has provided shocking data that has criticised the level of care medical staff are giving to their patients. London-based training facility Global Health Professionals regularly promote their Mandatory Training Courses which include briefings about health and safety, medication management and infection control for doctors, nurses and healthcare professionals. The firm have recently reported an increased demand for their services from numerous healthcare agencies. These mandatory training courses are essential for nurses and healthcare professionals as they provide students and staff with the knowledge of safety and well-being for all patients, visitors and other members of staff.

The National Bereavement Survey was conducted to find out from families how they rated the care their loved ones received in the last three months of their lives. The results revealed that families said only 51.8% of nurses and 58.8% of doctors always treated their relatives with dignity and respect.

Global Health Professionals has built a strong reputation within the industry for their mandatory training services, and has received great feedback from the many healthcare and nursing agencies they have worked with. Fatmata from MedicsPro enjoyed her course and said, “Very good presentation. I’ve learnt so much on this A&E training. Excellent teaching skills.” Miriam from Delta Agency also attended one of Global Health Professionals workshops and said, “The best thing about this IV therapy workshop was the way that the trainer imparted the knowledge in the simplest way possible so that we could understand every concept. I was very blessed to have this kind of training. I really loved the topic on drug calculations, it was very easy to understand.”

The material used in mandatory training courses given by Global Health Professionals is all evidence based and is delivered by expert trainers. Other courses they offer include First Aid, a CACHE Level 1 award in Introduction to Health, Social Care and Children’s and Young People’s Settings and a People Movers Manual Handling Course.

Global Health Professionals are a London-based training facility located in London Bridge and Tottenham. They have grown to be of the UK’s foremost providers of health and social care courses as well as their highly demanded mandatory training courses.
