The not so recent COVID 19 pandemic has added new responsibilities to the roles of security professionals making them responsible for health checks of staff and visitors, implementing health measures such as minimum distancing, visitor number restrictions, sanitizing, enforcing masks, and new safety regulations. This requires security professionals to develop the capacity to satisfy post-lock-down requirements while ensuring compliance with legislative and industry guidelines. Security providers are struggling to work out ways to minimize the future risk and ensure the safety of people while using facilities post-lock-down. The new security personnel asks for more communicative functions while providing assistance at public access places and liaising with the public to make them understand new measures. As businesses in the UK have resumed their normal functioning, the need for security has increased to ensure a smooth recommencing process and meet new requirements for managing people. Given changes to our ways of interaction, businesses need to respond quickly to the shifting safety climate and ensure the visible presence of security staff at public and commercial premises making certain that the wellbeing and safety of the people are as important as their security.

Amongst all the known security methods, manned guarding services are known to deliver comprehensive protection coverage in times of increasing security needs. The increasing number of larger shopping malls, residential enclaves, luxury hotels, and the existing law and order situation is driving demand for manned security for individuals and businesses.
