

New report shows that despite great progress in education, London remains stagnant on social mobility

Thursday 13 February, 2020

London has a broken path to social mobility, according to a new report published today (13 February) by independent charity, the Mayor's Fund for London, and leading global management consulting firm, Oliver Wyman, challenging the established narrative that London is a 'social mobility engine' for young people.

Through a new review of multiple datasets and by conducting extensive interviews, 'One City. Two Worlds', reveals that, despite significant success in education, young Londoners from low income backgrounds are less likely to move into professional or managerial jobs than young people in any other English region – 17% compared to 30% nationally. This is despite educational attainment being higher in the capital and a narrowing of the attainment gap between pupils eligible for free school meals and their more affluent peers.

This is matched by data showing that the London job market continues to favour the privileged, with those from more affluent backgrounds occupying 54% of the capital's highest skilled jobs. This has resulted in more than a quarter of young people from low income backgrounds in London believing 'people like me' do not succeed in life.

The report also highlights the "London Doughnut Problem": a situation where more high value jobs and opportunities are in London's core districts, whereas the outer boroughs are facing higher levels of poverty. There are notable gaps in statutory and non-statutory support in certain pockets of the outer ring of the London doughnut. Among the boroughs with the greatest levels of child deprivation, inner city councils appear to receive more funding for youth provision than their peers on the periphery.

Impetus for the research came from concerns that national reports and indices have consistently over reported the social mobility picture in London, with regional data masking deep levels of poverty and inequality. In addition, the national narrative has under-recognised how the magnet effect of London has created a uniquely competitive labour market, preventing young Londoners from low income backgrounds without the networks or resources to access higher status careers.

Existing research has shown:

- 700,000 children live in relative poverty in London, more than the entire population of Sheffield;
- London boroughs' spending power per person has fallen 37% in real terms by 2020, compared to 29% across the rest of England, with almost half of all London's youth centres having closed;
- Even when those from lower income backgrounds succeed in entering professional employment, they earn, on average, £10,660 less per year than those whose parents were in higher professional and managerial employment - this compares to a gap of £6,800 nationally.

To tackle the broken ladder of social mobility, 'One City. Two Worlds' proposes a system overhaul, and calls for a better co-ordinated approach to create a 'cradle to career' pathway, which would include better use of data to direct support and funding decisions. The report also emphasises that the potential for immediate impact lies in the hands of corporate London who have an important role to play in placing socio-economic diversity at the core of their workforce strategies. Practically, this translates into more employability support in outer London boroughs, helping businesses adapt both their hiring and staff development policies, and increasing mentorship and role model schemes.

Launching the report, Kirsty McHugh, Chief Executive, Mayor's Fund for London, said: "Contrary to popular belief, social mobility in London is not sorted. Young Londoners face a unique set of challenges which are often overlooked by national datasets. However, we are a rich city. We can and must do better to support London businesses, charities and public sector create a more co-ordinated 'cradle to career' system where young people do not struggle to access jobs that help them live fulfilling lives'.

Debbie Weekes-Bernard, Deputy Mayor for Social Integration, Social Mobility and Community Engagement, said: "Where you come from should have no bearing on what you achieve, yet there are too many young Londoners struggling to access the wealth of opportunities our city offers. The Mayor and I are committed to making London a more equal city and continue to work with businesses, local authorities and civil society groups to dismantle the barriers that prevent young people in our capital reaching their full potential."

Media:

Related Sectors:

Business & Finance :: Charities & non-profits :: Construction & Property :: Education & Human Resources :: Government :: Media & Marketing :: Opinion Article :: Public Sector & Legal ::

Related Keywords:

Social Mobility :: Young People :: London :: Corporate Sector :: Charity ::

Scan Me:

Toby Pittaway, Partner, Oliver Wyman, said: “London’s young people are working harder at school and it shows. But London isn’t yet giving young people all the support they need to realise their potential. This failure is harming our city, splitting it into two worlds. There are many reasons for this; but we believe with stronger purpose, leadership, smarter use of data and sharing of best practice, London can quickly change.”

-ENDS-

Company Contact: