NEW RESEARCH REVEALS 6 OUT OF 10 BURGLARY VICTIMS FEEL INSECURE IN THEIR OWN HOMES

To mark their 125th anniversary, UIA insurance poll the nation to discover the long-lasting impact of home burglaries and the UK's most prized possessions

Six out of ten burglary victims don't ever feel secure in their homes again, research revealed yesterday.

Experts who polled 1,000 adults who have been burgled found the trauma of a person breaking into their home has a long-lasting impact – the average victim takes seven months to return to some level of normality in their home.

But with many never feeling fully secure, a quarter of victims have subsequently had to move house after intruders broke into their home in order to feel safe once more.

Commissioned by UIA Insurance to mark their 125th anniversary, the research also saw the emotional impact increases depending on what was taken - four in ten lost sentimental items that were of little monetary value but 'irreplaceable' to them.

Yesterday Ian Cracknell, Chief Executive of UIA Insurance said: "The emotional impact of a stranger entering your home uninvited can outweigh the physical losses that take place and, as the results show, getting that feeling of security back again can be challenging.

"The feeling that your home space has been violated or in some way tainted can make it hard for homeowners to ever feel safe again.

"Having the proper measures in place to ensure you're as protected as possible can make the difference in gaining peace of mind around your home."

The study also found six in ten said their home felt tainted or spoiled after the break-in.

Over a third said the event caused a huge knock to their confidence and a fifth struggled to be on their own after they had been broken into. More than half said being burgled left them angry for months after the event.

And closure is hard to get, with the burglars avoiding being caught or prosecuted in more than two thirds of the burglaries studied.

In fact, the emotional upset at being a victim of crime caused the most grief for those who had been burgled, while the pain experienced by the loss of sentimental items outweighed that of losing more practical goods.

The most commonly stolen items were jewellery, followed by electronic gadgets like an mp3 player, cameras and games consoles.

But photos and family heirlooms proved the most distressing items to lose, results showed.

Over two thirds had items stolen they deemed 'very expensive' like televisions, laptops and even paintings or other valuables.

A quarter of people saw their property 'trashed' following the break in, with damage to windows and furniture or general vandalism inside their home common.

While a smashed window was the most common method of gaining entry by criminals breaking a door was the second most likely.

Ian Cracknell added: "We understand the impact this can have on people on a long-term basis, which is
