

?NZ employees not given enough support to act ethically, reveals Institute of Business Ethics' survey

Monday 3 December, 2018

Only 29% of the New Zealand employees say that their organisation has a comprehensive formal ethics programme

28th November 2018: The Institute of Business Ethics today publishes the results of a survey which asks New Zealand employees their views of ethics in their workplace.

It reveals that only 29% say that their organisation has a comprehensive formal ethics programme, while 10% say that their organisation offers no work ethics-related information, training or support channels.

The IBE's Ethics at Work survey is the only one of its kind covering Australia and New Zealand. It provides real insight into employees' views on ethics across all sectors and job roles. Over 2,000 employees were surveyed across Australia, New Zealand and the UK, including 752 in New Zealand.

This is the first time that the survey, first introduced in the UK in 2005, has been conducted in Australia and New Zealand. It asks employees how they experience ethical dilemmas in their day-to-day working lives. It looks at whether they have witnessed misconduct; whether they have reported it; and what if anything stops them from doing so.

The IBE asked employees how their organisation supported them to 'do the right thing'. The IBE has identified four key building blocks needed for a comprehensive ethics programme:

Code of Ethics - 70% of NZ employees say their organisation has written standards of ethical business conduct that provides guidelines for their job

Speak Up/Whistleblowing process - 56% of NZ employees say their organisation provides employees with a means of reporting misconduct confidentially (compared with 61% in Australia and 64% in the UK)

Advice line - Less than half of NZ employees (46%) have access to advice or an information helpline where they can get advice about behaving ethically at work

Ethics training - 51% of NZ employees are given training on standards of ethical conduct (compared with 59% in Australia and 56% in the UK).

The Ethics at Work: 2018 survey of employees: Australia, New Zealand and United Kingdom highlights the positive impact on employees of having a comprehensive ethics programme, for example:

85% of employees across Australia, New Zealand and the UK in organisations with a comprehensive ethics programme say their organisation acts responsibly in all its business dealings, in comparison with 54% in organisations without an ethics programme.

Employees across Australia, New Zealand and the UK in organisations with an ethics programme who have been aware of misconduct are more likely to have spoken up about misconduct (79% vs. 32% of those without an ethics programme)

Line managers in organisations with a comprehensive ethics programme are more likely to be perceived as setting a good example

83% of employees in organisations with a comprehensive ethics programme say their line manager sets a good example of ethical business behaviour, in comparison with 38% in organisations without an ethics programme.

Philippa Foster Back CBE, Director of the Institute of Business Ethics said: "The NZX has issued recommendations for listed companies to have a code of ethics and training programme, and these results show the value of these programmes.

Not only do they support employees to do the right thing; they also provide assurance to stakeholders – like investors and customers – that the organisation is operating sustainably, with business ethics in mind."

About the Ethics at Work survey

The IBE has surveyed British employees since 2005, but given that organisations are increasingly taking an integrated approach at the international level, we have expanded the number of countries included in the research to cover France, Germany, Ireland, Italy, Portugal, Spain, Switzerland and the UK within Europe and Australia, New Zealand and Singapore.

This report describes findings from Australia, New Zealand and the UK and provides comparisons with averages for the three countries. The survey was completed by a total of 2,268 respondents across Australia, New Zealand and the United Kingdom. It was comprised of a representative sample of about 750 working adults in each country aged 18+. The survey was undertaken between 5th and 25th February 2018.

The averages reflect the percentage of the 2,268 Australian, New Zealand and UK employees after each country's data was weighted to be representative of the workforce by gender, age and region.

A separate report looks deeper at the New Zealand findings.
