'Precision; or the quality, condition or fact of being exact and accurate is imperative to business success' stated a spokesperson from Precision Acquisitions Direct in a statement released last week. In the current climate of uncertainty, where Brexit is still holding a question mark over the future of UK enterprise, and Scotland preparing to make another bid for independence, precision could be the only constant for many business professionals. Committing to precision is taking the ultimate control, and leaving little margin for error. In many areas of life, precision is critical, for example a brain surgeon must have precision when operating, or there could be catastrophic consequences for their patient. A deep sea diver must be precise when underwater, timing their rise to the surface just right so that they have enough oxygen to last. Precision Acquisitions Direct believe that while in business the consequences are not life and death, the stakes are still high and precision remains a critical component.

In the statement released last week, Precision Acquisitions Direct outlined research into how precision and planning can directly influence success. In a study published in 2010, the business growth of 11,046 companies was monitored and the results highlighted the impact planning had on business performance, not just for new companies finding their feet, but for established organisations. The firm has deduced that planning for success has such a significant impact due to the line between success and failure being incredibly fine. Being precise; planning and preparing for all potential outcomes allows professionals to remain on their chosen path and overcome any challenges they encounter on their way to the top.

Precision Acquisitions Direct is urging people to take a more planned approach to their success. The firm is adamant that by nurturing a detail orientated mind-set and a determined attitude can support growth both personal and professional growth in the current climate of uncertainty.
