Entrepreneurship, especially in the early days, is a whirlwind of deadlines, multitasking, and decision-making - there just never seems to be enough hours in the day. Important responsibilities contribute to the achievement of your long-term goals, whilst urgent responsibilities require immediate attention. These activities are often tightly linked to the accomplishment of someone else's goal - such as a role model. Not dealing with these issues will cause immediate consequences in business and personal spheres of life. This is one of the reasons why Stephen Covey, one of America's most influential keynote speakers, developed a time management matrix formula. He did this by working on the assumption that tasks could be split into one of four quadrants, determining its importance in relation to urgency. By breaking down a daily to-do list and using the theory below, it is possible to determine where each task falls. Each quadrant has a specific purpose:

Quadrant I – important deadlines with high urgency

The first quadrant contains tasks and responsibilities that need immediate attention.

Quadrant II – long-term development and strategising

The second quadrant is for items that are important without requiring immediate action. Covey points out that this quadrant should be used for long-term strategizing.

Quadrant III – distractions with high urgency

The third quadrant is reserved for tasks that are urgent, without being important. Covey recommends minimising or even eliminating these tasks as they do not contribute to your output. Delegation is also an option here.

Quadrant IV – activities with little to no value

The fourth and last quadrant focus on tasks and responsibilities that do not yield any value - items that are unimportant and not urgent. These time wasters should be eliminated at any costs.

Covey states that the majority of focus should lie in quadrant II, as the majority of quadrant I tasks should have fallen into that section had better planning taken place.
