

Sainsbury's Performance Shows Importance Of Convenience In Shopper Marketing

Tuesday 21 January, 2014

The performance of Sainsbury's this Christmas – and the fact that it now has more convenience stores than conventional supermarkets in its estate - reinforces the importance of retailers and suppliers gaining a more detailed understanding of changing shopper habits and needs, according to Bridgethorne, the category management and shopper marketing specialist.

Sainsbury's like-for-like sales over the festive period may only have grown by 0.2% but if you factor in results from new convenience stores up to January 4th 2014, it equates to a 2.7% growth.

Sainsbury's impressive performance was driven by sales of own brand food products as well as its online and convenience store businesses. Sainsbury's success has been driven by its ability to convey quality and price at a time when value are vital attributes in the retail sector.

"What we are seeing here is the outcome of a steady and sustained power shift away from major brands and retailers to the shopper," explains Bridgethorne co-founder John Nevens.

"Part of this has been due to socio-demographic changes, from an ageing population and the rise of single occupancy households; but importantly with Sainsbury's performance, through multi-format retailing taking account of the continuing drive for convenience they have got to grips better with this new shopper landscape."

The improvement in Sainsbury's performance, which demonstrates a recognition of changing shopper behaviour, should sound a warning to suppliers that they need to understand better these changes if they are going to succeed long term. Suppliers and retailers have to influence their shopper's journey through the Point of Purchase Interface, says Nevens – the place where their shoppers and their products meet – and to create a strategic role for the shopper in their planning alongside the consumer. So, if shoppers are now in control and have different missions and requirements to consumers, suppliers and retailers have to address their needs.

"Fully integrating your shopper into your organisation's existing strategy, planning and activation processes will lead to more effective commercial investment, without necessarily actually requiring more commercial investment. We call it Integrated Shopper Management....or "Shopperism" for short," he adds.
