Artisan sloe gin makers from across the world will gather at the George Inn, a village pub on the Kent/Sussex border near Tunbridge Wells, to vie for the coveted 'Sloe Ginster World Champion' title for 2015, on Wednesday 16th December. Judging begins at 2:00pm

The competition is open to all makers of sloe gin – amateur and professional – and there are award categories for other botanical liqueurs including damson gin and sloe vodka.

Would be champions can just enter on the day or send their liqueurs by post to the pub. Further details and entry forms can be downloaded from www.moondown.co.uk/bookingforms/MoonDown_SGBF_2015.pdf

The poor summer has provided ideal growing conditions for sloes or drupes, promising a bumper crop of the bitter fruit of the blackthorn bush. Foragers are now eagerly awaiting the first frost, after which by tradition, the berries are harvested.

This Christmas marks the 7th year of the annual event that began when pub locals began arguing over the perfect sloe gin recipe. Dating back to around 1750, The George Inn, a traditional country pub with cosy log fires, makes an ideal setting to judge the most traditional of Christmas liqueurs.

Sloes, a smaller relative of the plum, are used to make the red liqueur, normally with an alcohol content between 15 and 30% abv. Traditionally it is made by infusing gin with the bitter-tasting drupes, using sugar to extract the sloe juices.

"Hand crafted sloe gins are generally superior to commercially produced branded sloe gin liqueurs, which are made by flavouring cheaper neutral grain spirits, producing an inferior flavour akin to a fruit cordial taste," said pub landlord Greg Elliot.

Some sloe gin connoisseurs say that each drupe should be hand-pricked with a thorn taken from the blackthorn bush on which it grew. Other maintain that the drupes may only be pricked silver pin or fork.

Modern protagonists pick the sloes earlier and freeze them, avoiding the pricking stage, claiming that this not only splits the drupes, but by analogy to ice wine, the freezing changes the flavour of the drupes.

Last year's entrants travelled far and wide to contest the competition. The Champion Artisan Sloe Ginster 2014 title was awarded to Edinburgh-based Demijohn. Nearer to home, Sloe Seduction of Marden in Kent was named Gold Medal Winner for South East England. The Homemade Sloe Ginster Champion was Grace Winey, who came down from Bury St Edmunds in Suffolk to compete.

This year' sloe gin makers can also send their entries in by post to the George Inn by 10th December.

All proceeds of the event are donated to the MS Society which supports people with Multiple Sclerosis
