

Solihull Fixer launches campaign calling on young women to take up sport

Monday 7 October, 2013

A Solihull Fixer is on a mission to inspire others to follow her lead and learn to love fitness.

Britannie Crossfield is using her drive to lift more, run faster and keep on getting fitter to urge other young women to discover the benefits of exercise.

With support from Fixers, the charity that supports young people aged 16-25 to tackle the issues that fire them up, Britannie is launching a poster campaign to spread her message throughout Birmingham.

"I've always loved fitness, it's always been part of my life," she says. "I like to take part in Zumba. I actually like to go to the gym, I love being on the machines. It makes me feel like I'm on top of the world.

"But I'm really concerned about the number of females who just simply do not carry on with any fitness activity once they leave secondary school."

Research from the Women's Sport and Fitness Foundation suggests that 80% of women in the UK aren't doing enough exercise to stay healthy, a figure that rises to 90% among girls aged 16 and under.

"The number of females in sport is terrible in comparison to the number of males," Britannie says. "I think it has increased somewhat since the Olympics but still there's a massive gap.

"It's just a shame really because you shouldn't be held back in sport for something as simple as your gender.

"The attitude difference between males and females is so drastic. Men often make going to the gym a social event. They ring up their friends, make a day of it and then they go out afterwards.

"But with females, they are much more laid back. They often simply don't want to go, they'd rather stay at home."

Fixers works with young people across the UK. Each Fixer is supported to create the resources they need to make their chosen project a success, with creative help from media professionals to make their own promotional material, such as films, websites or – as in Britannie's case – posters.

"I've created a series of posters to encourage more 16-19-year-old females to get more involved in sport," she says. "The posters show girls putting sport as a part of their day-to-day lifestyle."

"Sport doesn't have to take over your life. It can be something you integrate."

Britannie is determined to help young women think about the wide range of sporting opportunities that exist for them, and then to encourage them to get into the habit of taking regular exercise.

"I'm going to put these posters around my own secondary school and then around other colleges and sixth forms in Solihull," she says.

"I really hope my poster campaign will make a difference to at least one female, to make her feel there is some kind of support out there for her."

Fixers has already supported over 9,000 young people across the UK to have an authentic voice in their community.

"Fixers started in 2008 as just an idea... an idea given a voice by some 9,000 young people over the past five years," says Margo Horsley, Chief Executive of Fixers.

"They have reached thousands of people with their work, on a national stage as well as in and around where they live. They choose the full array of social and health issues facing society today and set about making their mark. Fixers are always courageous and their ideas can be challenging and life-changing, not just for themselves."
