Pi Industries have shared their 3 top tips for turning salespeople into stars.

Setting targets

A set target provides a standard and something for people to aim for; without targets people can become complacent and lazy. The key to this is identifying the top performers from the middle and the bottom group and set each a different target.

Always seeking new talent

Continuously adding to the sales force puts pressure on existing salespeople and stops them from getting complacent. They are forced to always perform to the best of their abilities and keep achieving good results; otherwise they will be replaced.

Not capping commission

Capping commissions means that top performers will inevitably work up to the cap and stop. Money is a huge incentive, and not having a commission cap means that people have the ability to control what they make. The potential is limitless and therefore a massive incentive for people to work to a consistently high level.

Although still a relatively young company, only being in business for a few months, Pi Industries have already garnered recognition for their ability to increase sales for a range of clients in different industries. At Pi Industries they use event marketing campaigns to make personal connections with consumers. Their direct and personalised approach allows them to build brand loyalty, increase customer acquisition and raise brand awareness. At Pi Industries they prepare their sales contractors with all of the relevant product knowledge so they are able to represent their clients with total confidence, professionalism and transparency. The firm's confident sales contractors are able to encourage consumers to have confidence in the brand, which encourages more sales.

Pi industries are encouraging companies to implement these tips in order to achieve maximum results from their sales force and help to turn salespeople into sales stars.
