

Who You Gonna Call? UK Consumers Renew Vote Of Confidence In Independent Financial Advice Sector

Monday 11 November, 2013

Banks, friends and independent financial advisers are the most popular sources with Britons looking for financial information

Almost one in five Brits have sought advice from an independent financial adviser in the last five years SIPP, annuity purchases and inheritance tax planning are the areas consumers are least confident of tackling without professional advice

Only 24% of consumers are confident of taking out a SIPP without professional help

Unbiased.co.uk's 'how to choose an adviser' checklist helps consumers get the most from meeting with an adviser

New research from unbiased.co.uk's GetAdvised campaign shows that independent financial advice has been a staple in the UK's search for financial help and guidance. And according to unbiased.co.uk, the find an adviser search, banks, friends and independent financial advisers top the list of most popular sources for Britons looking for financial information in the last five years.

Almost one in five Brits (19%) have sought advice from an independent financial adviser in the last five years, rising to almost a quarter (24%) of the nation's over 60s. Looking at the UK's overall usage for advice, 29% of Brits state they've sought advice from a financial adviser in their lifetime.

Unbiased.co.uk's GetAdvised campaign aims to engage consumers with their finances, highlighting the importance of professional, whole of market advice.

Despite the rise of DIY finance offerings, when looking at consumers' confidence in tackling their finances without professional help, the need for advice clearly stands out. While over half of the nation states they would be confident in arranging a residential mortgage without the help of an adviser, this number drastically reduces when looking at areas such as SIPP, annuity purchases and inheritance tax planning, with 24%, 27% and 27% retrospectively.

Karen Barrett, Chief Executive of unbiased.co.uk, comments: "It's encouraging to see that for the past five years, UK consumers have continued to reach out to advisers for help and guidance. Our research has highlighted there are times when professional financial advice is essential in making the life decisions that can have a considerable financial impact. When it comes to SIPP, annuity purchases and inheritance tax planning, consumers clearly feel least confident in making DIY decisions. These are areas where speaking to a financial adviser can make sure you make the right choices for your specific life goals.

"A simple chat with an adviser using our checklist can be the first step in helping you identify the 'right' financial adviser to help tackle your finances. They can help you make the right choices on some of the most important decisions of your life, saving you essential time and money in the long run.
